INTRODUCTION

Have you ever wondered how all the technology work gets done in business, at home based-businesses, at newspapers and magazines that send millions of issues every month, or even every day?

It all happens with just a handful of software programs that have been at the top of the industry for many years. This book takes you inside those applications to show you just how to get the benefit of using them for things you never thought possible.

HARDWARE BASICS

The hardware I do my design work doesn't have to be the top of the line system. Why? Because I make it run like a top of the line system. I remove many things from the system and stop many processes from running in the background, and shut down non-essential functions inside the operating system in order to gain the full functionality of my computer. We'll get into the guts of how to do that later but to give you an example, just visit a Kinko's or a Library, you'll see what I mean. So, let's get started learning how to do it all...

Bryce

Bryce is the 3D design platform that I use for most of my work. Especially book covers. The workload is split between Bryce, 3D Studio and Autodesk VIZ, which you'll learn about later, but first let's get to know Bryce. There are newer versions, but I'll be using version 5 for this tutorial, because it remains the most popular. Bryce allows you to create almost anything in 3D. If you can imagine it, it can be done in Bryce. I've created everything from a chair to an entire city. Complete with cars, people, landscape. Then animated it all.
