REMOVING THE FEAR FACTOR

Most people who don't understand how the computer operates have a fear about it. I've seen many studies, talked to many people, and been the consultant on many projects where I had to train people in that very state of mind.

Getting past the fear of turning on the power, listening to the fan on the power supply start to rotate, seeing the power button on the monitor light up, seeing the screen become active when things start appearing, all these can cause stress in a person who has a fear of working on a computer.

Taking the steps necessary to overcoming this fear is simple. Let's work on exposing the mystery inside the box. To do this, let's:

- Look inside the computer and see what happens when the power is turned on.
- Look inside the computer and see the power supply.
- Look inside the computer and see the fan on the power supply start to spin.

Once these three things take place, there is a great chance that you will see there is no mystery inside the box, and an even greater percentage that you will overcome your fear of working on a computer.
