DEVELOPING DEDICATED DISCIPLES

KEITH HAMMOND

Introduction

Church leadership is responsible for helping to help those under them to walk into their calling, once either the leadership or the person called recognizes their gifts and calling.

It's a simple concept, if you never train anyone to help oversee the church or operate the ministry while you are there, it will fail if God ever decides to call you home, or send you elsewhere.

The problem in most churches today, is that pastors and church leadership are hanging on to their titles, positions, and roles so tightly, that there often isn't much room for anyone else. Especially if that person has gifts, skills, talents, abilities, memory, knowledge and resources beyond what the scope and capability of those in leadership have. It's sad, really, but true, and I see it all over the place.

In my book, "Developing Dynamic Deacons" I address and provide teaching and training on how to build up the men's ministry in your church using the deacons as the primary source for leadership.

In this practical text, using similar methods, and numerous scriptures from both the old and new testament, churches can and should look to their pastoral and ministerial staff as leaders who can help people who are called, grow in their area of ministry.

Jesus trained twelve, how many will you train?
